

A Rusty Car That No Longer Sees Tar

Commented [WU1]: Great work Dave, love it. I've made some suggestions that I think might make it flow a bit better and put a question or two in bits I'm not sure of, but great job!

It once was new and a lovely colour Blue but now the paint is gone a bit faint. It looks so sad but don't feel bad this car has been through a lot since new.

The owner is here but he finds it hard to bear the condition of the car in this current year. This car holds a special place in his mind, even though half of the car is hard to find.

He remembers well the shiny blue and now the car simply won't do. But all is not lost as he's selling me the car, So soon it will see the shiny tar.

new paint, an engine a gearbox and patience of a saint. 4 new wheels should see this car go from old and blue to looking like new.

The cost will be high but I'll just let that thought fly: this car will once more take me on a tour of this emerald isle, But this I'm afraid could take a while.

I will paint it back blue as no other colour will do and It will be bluer than blue when finally I'm through.

Commented [WU2]: Who is the you here?

This car had to stop visiting places but soon it will carry some happy faces. Just like this virus it put us on hold. Stay strong and follow the advice and the future (?) will unfold. We are in this together and in it for the better and soon we will see the shiny Tar too.

A little bit of time and cooperation will once again make us a great nation.

Our frontline staff are running wild to protect every man woman and child. We need to help them and we can do too, Just stay at home and make your trips very few.

Just like the car we were down and out but something will change and make us realise what it was all about. Soon We too will see the (sky?) blue and be able to travel on the shiny tar anew. So stay at home and wait for the right time, and we will once again be in our prime.
